"Above all, NMU is the best place to experience American culture and learn English. When I was there, Korean students were not there except me, so I could have many international friends, including the U.S. and China. Based on this experience, currently I am doing global business very well."

Lee decided to study media production at NMU, and said the field studies course was particularly important to his profession. He credits Communications and Media Studies professors Dwight Brady and the late Chuck Ganzert for their help with academics and the graduate school application process.

Brady recalls introducing Lee to a Supreme Court case in a media law class that changed the trajectory of his career.

"The court's decision in the 2010 Citizens United case is one of the most important First Amendment cases in the last 50 years, because it radically changed American politics," Brady said. "It basically allowed unlimited amounts of money, that cannot be traced back to donors, to flow into our political races. Lee became very interested in this case and made it the topic of his master's thesis at Northwestern University."

Brady said that, despite a bit of a language barrier, Lee performed exceptionally well in his classes and developed a keen interest in politics.

Upon completing his masters at Northwestern, Lee returned to Korea. He became a key part of Lee Jaemyung's campaign against his main rival, Yoon Suk-yeol.
